I'm interested to see how Adobe handles the new pricing model. There are a number of unanswered questions, such as what will happen to the old pricing model? Will Adobe assign different license keys to different pricing plans? Will browsers check for license key validation? I'm also curious to see what the impact of Creative Cloud will be on use of the software. Color has always been one of my favorite aspects of this software. If Photoshop was just a basic RAW converter, this would have been probably one of my first choices. It's still a struggle to get the camera to produce perfect highlights and shadows. You're often asked to make keytones more precise. Here's the scene above. In Adobe Camera Raw, you can soft light all 4 corners to bring out detail, and follow that up with a slight adjustment on the highlights to dim them. But underneath the highlights, there is still room for improvement. I've yet to find a way to automate the hell out of this process.

By locking up your canvas so you can't add, move, or paint directly on it, you get faster work from a faster app. But when you don't want to work this way, you still have tools at your disposal.
