Although the details of your company's policy on pet owners varies from one to another, it's a good idea to have one. It could save you from a nasty run-in with your boss over a poop bag. Let's start with the poop bag: While some companies provide them for use, most don't. (Sorry, but if you drop a big pile of doggie poop on your boss' desk, chances are he'll get grossed out.) If you can't get to a bathroom, consider bringing along some small plastic bags or a sack to deal with it in. Then, when your dog leaves the bathroom, it's easier to clean up. Also keep in mind that many dogs poop right before they eat. So if you're talking about bringing your dog to work, you'll want to plan accordingly. If your company has a no-pet policy, there will be no-pet signs posted throughout the facility. But the truth is, even if your boss doesn't explicitly say you can't bring a dog to work, he might have a negative reaction to seeing one. It's probably best to explain your situation up front, and if you do have to ask whether you can bring a dog to work, make it as nonthreatening as possible. A better way to go is to work with your company's human resources department to set up a policy that allows you to bring your dog to work. This means you have to be clear about the rules, and your human resources representative can point out some of the things your boss might be worried about, such as your dog's ability to control its potty
